Director of Student Motivation and Culture, Greenfield

Imagine. Innovate. Empower.

We believe school should be a partnership between students, teachers, families and communities. That students must learn academics, social emotional skills, goal setting skills and how to learn independently in order to succeed in college and life. We believe that motivation is rooted in a scholar’s personal why and that it’s our job to help all of our scholars deepen their sense of self, drive and sense of belonging.

We believe success takes a team. Help lead ours.

Motivation, Culture & Goal-Setting at Greenfield
At Greenfield Schools, personal growth and student motivation are just as important as academic growth. We integrate social-emotional learning and student-driven goal-setting into all aspects of our program.

The Greenfield model has four unique structures that support bringing these priorities to life:

- Goal Teams: A group of 12-18 students who work with a “Goal Coach” or mentor to build a community of support, set goals and reflect on progress.
- Dream Teams: A group of family members and community mentors who come together several times per year to hear scholars present on their progress and to support scholars on their journey to meet goals and uncover individual students’ passions, strengths, and dreams.
- Self-Directed Learning: Daily opportunities to learn independently (with teacher coaching) and build the skills and habits needed to thrive in college.
- Circle and Compass Habits: Social-emotional learning at Greenfield is based on the Compass framework developed at Valor Collegiate in Nashville. We call the work we do to grow, both individually and in relationships, “Working the Compass,” and it is an integral part of our daily routines. Students work through a self-directed Compass Curriculum during Goal Teams to explore their own identity, consider the perspective of others, and practice Compass Habits such as growth mindset and gratitude. Students share their Compass work and build connections with teachers and peers in powerful twice-weekly circles. Working the Compass also allows students to discuss and grapple with complex issues within their school and community.

Through development of compass habits and short cycles of goal-setting and reflection, students take greater ownership over their learning. The connection between hard work and accomplishment becomes more explicit—building students’ sense of self-efficacy and desire to set increasingly ambitious and meaningful goals.
