Analysis: Lit - Antigone. True Tragic Hero

SUMMARY/ABSTRACT:

Despite some problems in presentation, overall the evidence is roughly presented and the evidence selected supports the assertion. However, some problems with presentation and a few pieces of evidence that do not strongly support the assertion prevent this paper from scoring a 3. This writer is just on the cusp of a 3 or higher and could easily be moved high up on the rubric with a few changes.

CRITERION 1: CHOICE

Most of the evidence is directly relevant to the assertion. In the third body paragraph, the two chunks of evidence cite that Creon is a) prideful and b) made a mistake in not burying his son. These lead directly to the assertion at the bottom of the paragraph, that “his own mistakes cause his own downfall along with those around him, [...] [his] great fall, pride, sorrow and mainly his control over his fate are the characteristics that fit with Aristotle’s view of the tragic hero.” As such, this is a strong choice, but not particularly persuasive (a higher standard on the rubric). A more persuasive evidence selection would be less obvious (it’s clear that Creon is prideful), or more subtle than the burial of his son.

However, the evidence selection in the second body paragraph is less strong. The two chunks of evidence are about Creon’s feelings about the skipped burial and his determination to die and not observe his sister’s death; these do not clearly relate to the assertion that this suffering was not under his own control, which would exclude him from the category of a tragic hero. While these pieces of evidence are certainly relevant, they are not direct support for the assertion, pushing the paper down to a 2.

CRITERION 2: PRESENTATION

In some cases, the evidence should be presented with a colon and not a comma, and therefore is not presented clearly. (One example of two: “Creon finally realizes his mistake when the blind prophet, Teiresias, shows it to him, ‘Pay to the dead his due [...]’ (153).”) This qualifies the overall presentation of evidence as “roughly presented,” although just barely.

The True Tragic Hero

At the soul of every classic tragic play is suffering and a tragic hero. Ordinary suffering can be caused mainly by death but also by mistakes a character makes, and other things the character loses like relationships and material items. All of the characters will usually feel some degree of suffering but none are as great as the suffering of the tragic hero. The tragic hero faces not only the death of some of those close to him and mistakes he makes but a great downfall. The tragic hero is usually born as a noble but because of his mistakes suffers a great downfall and deaths of those close to him; he controls his fate. Usually this suffering leads to a suicide by the tragic hero or the tragic hero becomes secluded and usually ends up dying. The tragedy Antigone is no different; each character suffers but only one tragic hero falls from his place and suffers the most because of the choices he makes. Each of the three characters Ismene, Haemon and Creon, suffer greatly because of death and a set fate but only one is the tragic hero because he controls his fate, bringing on his own great fall and many mistakes that cause the sufferings of those around him along with himself.

Ismene, the sister of Antigone, suffers greatly because of the curse her father has placed upon the family by accidently marrying his mother. This curse causes her entire family to die in various ways leaving Ismene with great suffering as the only remaining family member. After her two brothers kill each other she suffers greatly because her brother Polynices, “is not to be buried” (127). This disrespect and disregard for traditions and honor is what causes some of Ismene’s suffering. When Ismene finds out that Antigone is sentenced to death for burying her brother she tries to die along with Antigone claiming, “I am as much to blame as she is” (140). By doing this she is expressing her sorrow but is denied her death and forced to bear her sister’s, leaving Ismene as the only remaining family member. Ismene’s great fall from nobility, her mistake of not helping her sister bury Polynices, and the great suffering she has to endure after having to watch her sister die are some characteristics of a tragic hero, although she does not quite fit the part because these are mostly caused by her father’s curse; she does not control her fate.

Haemon, the son of Creon, suffers greatly from his father’s mistakes. He suffers greatly when he finds out his fiancé, Antigone, is going to be killed; he even tries to change Creon’s mind, something no one in the city dared to do, “Only because I know you are wrong, wrong! What sort of respect tramples on all that is holy?” (146). At this point he is trying to express his sorrow, but his father’s mistake damper’s him by ignoring him. His despair soon drives him to take his own life so that he can be with his bride in death. When Creon tells him he must watch Antigone die, Haemon responds, “That sight I’ll never see. Nor from this hour shall you see me again” (147). This expression of sorrow shows Haemon’s noble aspects and the extent to which he suffers. Haemon’s tragic end seems to fit perfectly with what Aristotle would define as a tragic hero; his suffering leads him to die beside his bride, waiting till Creon was in sight before stabbing himself with his sword. But Haemon’s death was not caused by his own mistakes but those of his father, which excludes him from being the tragic hero. Haemon does not control his own fate.

Creon, the king of Thebes, falls from his place and suffers his family’s death because of his own mistakes. One of these mistakes is his failure to honor Polynices with a burial. Creon also is too prideful, "No other touchstone can test the heart of man, / the temper of his mind and spirit, till he be tried / in the practice of authority and rule," (131). He considers himself higher than all the others which could possibly be his biggest mistake. Sentencing Antigone to death is also a mistake that leads to his downfall. This angers his son which causes Haemon to go to dire measures to avenge his father. Creon finally realizes his mistake when the blind prophet, Teiresias, shows it to him, "Pay to the dead his due. Wound not the fallen. / It is no glory to kill and kill again!" (153). Creon is finally able to see that Polynices deserves his respect, and without it Creon is doomed. He immediately goes to bury Polynices but his fate is sealed and he is forced to witness his son dying because of the mistakes Creon has made. When informing his wife of the news she in turn kills herself. His own mistakes cause his own downfall along with those around him. Creon's great fall, pride, sorrow, and mainly his control over his fate are the characteristics that fit with Aristotle's view of the tragic hero.

Creon most closely fits with Aristotle's definition of a tragic hero because of his mistakes, his pride, his great downfall, and his suffering. He does realize his mistakes as he nears the end but it is already too late to repair what he did. But according to Aristotle's view on tragic heroes it is not just those characteristics that make the hero; it is his control over his own destiny. Creon controlled his own fate through his actions and pride and is therefore the tragic hero of Antigone. A tragic hero does not suffer because of the mistakes of those around him or because of destiny; he suffers because of himself.
